Not illustrated. 1883 Excerpt: .Don, that brave defender of the house, who bad, like his young masters and mistresses, been sleeping with a soundness insured by a good conscience and a good supper, now appeared on the scene, and asserted himself loudly, and by his barking roused all the rest of the household; so there was soon a row of rough heads and a flutter of white garments at the top of the stairs, while Pat told all he knew of Ray Carrington. He had been very quiet and down in the mouth all day, and when Pat asked him if he would be long at the Signor s after school, he said that he was never going again, but should just run in for one minute to thank the Signor, and say good-bye. You ve said that before, said Pat. I mean it this time. Pat had to go to a shop to fetch something, and promised to call for Ray in a few minutes, and he was not much longer, but when he reached Miss Pink s house she told him that Ray had come and gone. The Signor was out, she said; and he would not go up, though the Signor had put down on paper just what he was to play, and told me he would be in very soon. He might have waited for me, grumbled Pat. What an impatient chap he is! And he set off home, expecting every minute that Ray would overtake...
