Equipment operators and other reclamation personnel, however, would be exposed to safety hazards during excavation. Exposure to elevated temperatures and noxious gases and steam would continue until completion of excavating and cooling activities. Moderate short-term beneficial impacts could occur from the recovery of extractable mineral resources after the fire is extinguished. Where local residents would be displaced to excavate fires and where buildings and other structures would be moved or demolished, the impacts could be locally significant. (See section 4. 2. 2. 2.) The postreclamation backfill area is not generally suitable for home or other construction purposes; however, most other land uses can be restored after fires are extinguished. Resulting beneficial impacts include broadening the postmining land uses and eliminating the potential for property destruction and the loss of valuable natural resources from forest fires ignited by coal mine fires. These benefits are significant and long term. (See section 4. 2. 2. 4.) Excavation would also result in improvements to esthetics, especially where the areas would be reclaimed to approximate premining conditions and where smoke and escaping gases are eliminated. Additional beneficial impacts include revegetation which would serve as food and cover for wildlife and prevent erosion and sedimentation. These benefits would be major and long term. Air quality would be temporarily impacted by increased fugitive dust and the heavy equipment emissions but would improve over the long term when smoke and noxious fumes are eliminated. Beneficial impacts to air quality would be potentially significant locally. Beneficial impacts would...
