Excerpt: . . . the Sacred Penmen were on all occasions left to express them after their own manner, and to vindicate and explain them by such reasoning as their own knowledge and understandings might supply. Both these opinions have their advantages and their disadvantages, and Unbelievers have shaped their arguments accordingly; availing themselves of the difficulties of both, and disregarding in each (as on all occasions they are wont to do) whatever is sound and valid. But, after all, Unbelievers seem to have little concern with this part of the subject: since it is only for those who admit the facts on which the authority of Revelation depends, and the certainty of the doctrines revealed, to inquire how the knowledge of them has been preserved and transmitted. All arguments therefore on this point, are to be considered as addressed to such persons, rather than to the professed Infidel....
