Excerpt: . . . to you, dear Mrs. Grey, was the answer, as Mrs. Marsh stopped and peered through the laurels in the bow-window at the speaker; the same to you, and very many of them, though I fear it will not be a merry Christmas to Worthington. Have you not heard of Mrs. Burgess, poor thing No! good gracious, not dead, surely I was sitting with her only yesterday morning. N o, not dead, but supposed to be dying as My husband has been at the Rectory ever since last night, and I just fast as she can. looked in for a moment on my way to the schools, and heard she was not expected to live through the day. Nelson. Here comes Mrs. Perhaps she has had some news since I was there. She still lives, was Mrs. Nelsons reply to the various questions which assailed her as she approached, whilst tears rolled down her face, but the rector has been up all night, and of course cannot leave her now till all is Mr. Nelson and Mr. Cuthbert are to do the whole three services between them to-day, and to-morrow being Sunday makes it very hard duty. Poor Brenda, ejaculated Mrs. Grey after a brief pause, during which the three ladies appeared each turning over in their minds the different effects that this death would have upon their circle, and upon Worthington in general; I wonder how she will bear it. She is wonderfully calm...
